Having a postpartum plan can help in prioritizing baby's needs and how you want those needs to be met. It can also help you feel less guilty about spending some alone-time and entrusting baby in someone else's care for a few hours. You'll need those destressing hours for your mental health. Here are a few tips from www.dona.org.

1.	birth of a baby, new parents need extra help to ensure that they can meet their needs for sleep. Support during the night, naps, and tag-team parenting can all be effective tools for meeting these important needs. Note that there are spaces for you to fill out more than one name for each time slot. This is because you will need more than one person to meet this important need. Remember, the goal is to schedule this type of support for several weeks. Potential sources of help are family members, friends, doulas, and members of your religious and/or community groups. If you identify gaps here, now is the time to strategize on how you will still address this important need.
	• The following people are available to help us rest:

2.	The need to have a group of friends who are also parents of young babies. Common sense and life experience tell us that having someone to talk to who can empathize with our experiences normalizes our problems and makes them more bearable. Research confirms this concept. These friends will enhance your life, rather than replace your existing support network. If you cannot identify several peers with young babies, then strategize on where you might find these friends. Suggestions include childbirth education classes, prenatal/postnatal fitness classes, breastfeeding support groups, common friends, "mommy's day out" programs, on-line discussion groups, and houses of worship.
	 The following people are friends or neighbors with babies of their own:
	includes the following resources:

3.	Nutritious meals and adequate hydration are very important, and not all that difficult to plan. Friends, family members, neighbors, coworkers, and friends through religious affiliations are often great sources of food. It's ok and even advisable to let people know what kinds of meals you would like—it is even all right to ask for things like french toast or pancakes. This way you will be able to enjoy the food rather than having things you do not like or eating 15 lasagnas in 3 weeks. Parents can also plan ahead by "double batching" meals that they prepare in the weeks before the birth of the baby. Plan on it being as much as a couple months before you will really want to start buckling down and preparing meals on a daily basis.
	• We would like to have food prepared and available for the firstweeks after the birth of our baby.
	The following are people who will be willing to bring us food if we ask, and we will set this up well-ahead of the baby's birth: O O O O O O O O O O O O O O O O O O
	 We will also prepare frozen dishes before the birth. Nutritious and affordable take-out or delivery options include:
4.	The need for knowledgeable, empowering breastfeeding support: Breastfeeding is a natural process, but it does not always come naturally. Few new or experienced mothers are blessed with a community of knowledgeable women around them to provide education, screening, support and guidance on breastfeeding during the several weeks that it takes to have breastfeeding well established. However, we know that the absence of these important people may lead to breastfeeding difficulties: painful nipples, inadequate milk supply, slow weight gain, fussy babies, and a sense of isolation. Some women think that these problems are a normal part of early breastfeeding, but they are not. Women who have appropriate support are able to avoid most difficulties. If your goal is to breastfeed, take the steps that will ensure your success—line up your support!
